BY MARIE MICHELSEN

Home designer Marie Michielssen completes her Earth collection with flower pots, vases and a papier-mâché lamp. For outdoor use, plant pots in terracotta have also been added. Everything comes in primitive-looking shapes, with a texture that accentuates the earthly character of the collection. "With the vases in papier-mâché, I feel my visual language shifting ever closer towards the sculptural. Even with the lamp, it was of great importance to me that it would remain aesthetically interesting when not turned on, explained Michielssen. The designer does not put anything down on paper upfront; no technical drawings or 3D models on a computer. Swould much rather let the material speak for itself in the design process. "During modelling, I often play with primary shapes such as a cone, a ball, or a square. I bring them together to come up with new shapes. For every design, an extensive study of shapes takes place beforehand; it all happens very intuitively." Papier-mâché has a great advantage since it allows a free, organic way of designing. Furthermore, this material provides a special tactile result, which is an absolute must for the Earth collection. The vases were fitted with a fibre layer inside, to guarantee their water tightness.
